

Student-Run Community Health Programs

Stefano Leitner and Casey Mason

- To allow medical students with experience in community medicine to share their insight and wisdom with each other for the benefit of their respective programs and communities.
- To brainstorm ideas of overcoming the adversities commonly faced in community medicine.
- To provide an opportunity for students to share and reflect on their experiences in community medicine.

Community medicine gives medical students an opportunity to practice humanism at the earliest stages of their careers. The impact that community medicine has had on past GHHS members has been emphasized through roundtable discussions during the past Chapman symposiums. This discussion provides a platform for the exchange of ideas and solutions pertaining to the common issues faced by all student-run free clinics and health promotion services. The goal is to continue inspiring medical students to explore community medicine as an avenue for delivering humanistic care for the underserved and uninsured populations of their respective communities.
